The Csikos is a man who from his birth, somehow grows up in his seat as other children doin a cradle.

The Csikos has the difficult task of keeping a watchful eye upon these herds. He knows their strength, birthday of every foal, and when the animal, fit for training, should be taken out of the herd. He has then a hard task upon his hands, compared with which a Grand-ducal wild boar hunt is child's play for the horse has not only to be taken alive from the midst of the herd, but of course safe and sound in wind and limb. For this purpose the celebrated whip of the Csikos serves him; probably at some future time a few splendid specimens of this instrument will be exhibited in the Imperial Arsenal at Vienna. beside the sword of Scanderhog and the Swiss "mor-

This whip has a stout handle from one and a half to two feet long, and a cord which measures not less than from eighteen to twenty-four feet in length .-The cord is attached to a short iron chain, fixed to the top of the handle by an iron ring. Sam is a cosy and ingenious wag, of quiet denote the horse's hoof; the step of his horse is not heard, and the whirling cloud of dust above his head alone marks his approach and disappearance. Although familiar with the use of a bridle, he despi-ses such a troublesome article of luxury, and guides his horse with his voice, hands, and feet—nay, it almost seems as if he directed it by mere exercise of most seems as if he directed it by mere exercise of the will, as we move our feet to the right or left, backward or forward, without its ever coming into our head to regulate our movements by a leather strap. In this manner for hours he chases the flying herd until at length he succeeds in approaching the animal which he is bent on catching. He then swings his whip around in immense circles, and throws the cord with such dexterity and precision that it twines around the neck of his victim. The leaden button at the end, and the knots along the cord, form a noose, which draws closer and tighter the faster the horse hastens on.

The foot soldier who has discharged his musket is lost when opposed to the Csikos. His bayonet, with which he can defend himself against the Uhlans and Hussars, is here of no use to him: all his practised manœuvres and skill are unavailing against the long whip of his enemy, who urags him to the ground, or beats him to death with his leaden buttons; nay, even if he had still a charge in his musket, he could sooner hit a bird on the wing than the Csikos, who, riding round and round him in wild bounds, dashes with his steed first to one side, then to another, with the speed of lightning, so as to frustrate any aim .-ble in the centre of the back shop,—the shutters were | The horse soldier, armed in the usual manner, fares not much better; and wo to him if he meets a Csikos singly! better to fall in with a pack of ravenous
